Case report and literature review. To describe the ultrastructural and molecular cytogenetic findings in a case of pure germ cell tumor of the ovary associated with pseudopregnancy. Pure germ cell tumor of the ovary is rare. A 76-year-old woman presented with right-sided lower abdominal pain. No ovarian mass was found on physical examination, but the right ovarian vein was displaced superiorly. Histopathology on peritoneal biopsy revealed germ cell tumor-like cells with sarcomatous features. The tumor cells were also positive for markers CD117, CD34, desmin, CK5/6, and CK7. The patient presented with signs of pseudopregnancy. Histopathology of a fallopian tube biopsy showed similar findings to the ovarian biopsy with no germ cell tumor. Chromosomal analyses were performed, and a clonal deletion of the Y chromosome, t(12;16) (p13;p13), was detected. A germ cell tumor with a concomitant pseudopregnancy may occur with or without an overt ovarian mass. Cytogenetic characterization is an important step in assessing the diagnosis and prognosis of ovarian germ cell tumor and may help to distinguish between a germ cell tumor and a gonadoblastoma. Ultrastructural analysis is an important method of confirmation of the diagnosis.Substance P-induced myoclonus is potentiated in aged rats f678ea9f9e
